Dems' Shameful Cover For Fetterman's Struggles

THE ISSUE: Democratic Senate candidate John Fetterman's performance at a recent debate.

John Fetterman

• Watching the Pennsylvania debate provoked the emotion of utter disgust — not at the pathetic candidate John Fetterman, but at those closest to him for having the audacity to think that he could effectively serve (“Painful display proves he can’t serve,” John Podhoretz, Oct. 26).

As a physician and as a person of compassion, it is inconceivable how those closest to him could subject him to this degree of mockery. It is purely shameful.

• Downplaying Fetterman’s physical condition is just one more example of the Democrats’ subterfuge regarding anything that has the slightest element of negativity.

It is close to election time, so the Democrats must paint a rosy picture so their constituency can be seduced into remaining in support.

• Unfortunately, the impact of a stroke on skills is the concern. I can explain.

in the Quaker State has done a great service to Pennsylvania voters — to Fetterman himself. I watched most of the recent debate and the man was totally on stage all night, staring into the camera, looking head-on. This candidate is clearly a very capable official.

Merit Bungle

stands up for. Losing out on acceleration, especially in math, in middle school can derail even brilliant kids from top high schools.

It pretends their problems are unsolvable “systemic” ones (rather than issues that are real, rigorous, in-person instruction to real, rigorous, in-person instruction). But the ones who wake nonsense might ameliorate.

Worse, it sends the message to parents that they simply don’t matter in New York public schools. Yes, families in some districts will be (rightly) furious — and much more likely to give up on the public school system and even on the city itself.

Good school system gives children in every district the chance to earn entry into a challenging middle school that can prepare for a challenging high school. No student should have the right to deny opportunity.

Chancellor Banks, you know this is the right move for kids and parents. Stick to your principles and undo this disaster.
